Rice Fields & Rice Field Wrestlers of Japan

IN THE RICE FIELDS OF JAPAN

There is nothing more lovely or more characteristic than the rice fields of Japan and to visit these with Burton Holmes is an unusually delightful experience. He takes you from one picturesque spot to another, where the hard-working little people of Japan of both sexes and all ages are toiling at the back-breaking work of rice growing. The workers are picturesque, the rice fields are beautiful and the scenic setting is like an exquisite series of paintings. In marked contrast to these glimpses of work-a-day Japan, Mr. Holmes asks you to go with him to a typical Japanese wrestling tournament; two teams of celebrated wrestlers are to contest for prizes; there is no man in either team who weighs less than three hundred pounds and some of them would tip the scales, at the ring-side, at nearer four hundred. These men are selected in their babyhood because of the size of their bones and probable future enormous weight when they shall have attained their full growth. They are practically bred and brought up for the express purpose of wrestling, — not the quick, nimble kind of wrestling we see in America, but a style all their own, where mere weight is almost everything, if coupled with giant strength.

For HOUSE ORGAN:

"In the Rice Fields of Japan" is the name given by Burton Holmes to a little trip to see the workers of Japan in the loveliest of farm lands, the rice fields. After work hours even these busy little people love to watch the famous giant wrestlers contesting for prizes. On..... Mr. Holmes will take you to the Rice Fields and afterwards to see huge men, not one of them less than 350 or 400 lbs. in weight, trying to throw each other, according to Japanese rules of the wrestling ring.
